

Economy Recovery Post-COVID-19

Almost overnight, COVID-19 and lockdown changed the face of our economy and its legacy will be felt for decades. The coming months and years are undoubtedly going to be the most challenging in our lifetime for our economy, society and many of us individually. Unemployment, low productivity, declining competitiveness and low innovation will be hard to resolve, and the post-coronavirus world is going to be very different from the world we left behind in March.

The US unemployment rate more than trebled in a single month, whilst in the UK more than four out of five retail outlets temporarily closed their doors. The government-imposed recession has also seen the government step in to support businesses on an unprecedented scale, with one in four workers having their salary supported by the furlough scheme.

Support for individuals and businesses has gone further than ever before, with banks offering mortgage payment holidays and suspending interest payments on credit. This reflects not only the political economy of the government-imposed nature of lockdown, but also what we have learned over recent decades about economic recovery.

Mitigating risk

We are truly at a historic moment. The COVID-19 crisis could mark a turning point in the direction of the UK's economy. The government is faced with a choice, to either use this moment to build a stronger, cleaner, fairer and more resilient economy, or further entrench an economy driven by debt-laden consumption.

We are under no illusions that we will recover to a world of slow growth, but we cannot be complacent about the risks. There are significant challenges and opportunities that the world is facing that are influencing long-term trends, and there are likely to be calls for those who benefited most from the lockdown to contribute most to paying for it.

Innovation

COVID-19 should not prevent us from finding innovative ways to accelerate progress. Now would be the right time to introduce fiscal, labour, pension, social, environmental and economic reforms. Governments and businesses could take this opportunity to act quickly, promoting full financial inclusion, the transition to a cashless economy and provision of better, more efficient services. It is an opportunity to rethink healthcare systems, digitize sectors of the economy accelerate productivity and encourage digital innovation.
